Features

- Time for play 14
Can Playing Out rise from the streets to become a national initiative? Tim Linehan looks at the birth of a movement.
- Wild things 22
Forest schools offer natural spaces for children to explore and learn. But what's the evidence for their success? Annie Woods and Cyndy Hawkins are on the trail.
- Lessons to learn 30
100,000 children under 16 run away from home or care every year. Natalie Williams from The Children's Society looks at what schools can do to recognize the signs.
- I'm all right Jack 38
Young men are wholly irresponsible when it comes to unintended teenage pregnancy, right? Quite the opposite. The trouble is that no-one has bothered to talk to them. Áine Aventin and MariaLohan describe a new project to help teenage boys open up.

3.5

Time for action 45

Has any condition been more misunderstood or feared than epilepsy throughout history? Emily Tingley looks at a project which aims to help schools to understand more about the condition.

The impact of family worklessness on children's education 52

The UK has the highest proportion of children living in workless households than almost any other country in the European Union. What impact does this have children's education. Ingrid Schoon describes new research.

Shades of grey 60

Educational disadvantage has been researched to death, yet the conclusions about poverty are often simplistic. Charlie Ogilvie uncovers some surprising insights from government data, and finds that the truth is not just black and white.

Bullying interventions 70

Bullying in school is universal and a range of methods aimed at tackling the problem has been developed. But which ones are most effective, and in what circumstances? Professor Ken Rigby investigates.

Getting to the root of exclusions 76

How do schools deal with the troubled families agenda? Rhian Beynon of Family Action looks at research dispelling the myth that children from troubled families are destined for educational failure.

Playing to learn 84

When the Scottish Government announced that it was going launch a national programme to promote play to all families with children. Irene Miller and Irene MacDonald evaluate its success.
